Risco de aborto na Idaho ameaça gravemente a saúde das mulheres: relatório fiery slot inglês analisado

O risco de afirmar claramente o que a Idaho argumentou na Suprema Corte dos EUA na manhã de quarta-feira é que é tão saadista e extremo que as pessoas possam não acreditar fiery slot

you. Idaho has one of the most restrictive abortion laws in the country. Prohibiting all abortions at any stage of pregnancy, with exceptions for rape or incest, the Idaho law allows doctors to perform abortions in cases where the woman's life - but not "merely" her health - is at risk.

In practice, this has become a ban on necessary abortions to save women's lives: according to Idaho hospitals, six pregnant women with medical emergencies were taken by helicopter to hospitals in states with life and health exceptions since Idaho began enforcing its abortion ban. One way to describe this state of affairs is to say that the Idaho abortion law conflicts with the best medical practice. Another way to describe it is to say that the law forced pregnant women to flee the state for their lives.

Idaho abortion law conflicts with federal medical emergency law

The federal government says that Idaho's ban on abortions to preserve health conflicts with a federal statute known as the Emergency Medical Treatment and Labor Act, or EMTALA. The 1986 law requires that all hospital emergency departments, or ERs, that receive Medicare funding - or, in practice, almost all - must provide stabilizing care to patients with medical emergencies. The law was passed to ensure that patients in medical crisis are not excluded from ERs for not being able to pay.

In practice, the law also formalized the spirit of medical professionals' ethics, requiring doctors and hospitals to preserve the health of their patients, prevent the worsening of those in crisis, and save lives. It creates an affirmative obligation for doctors to care for patients.

This obligation - to intervene in a medical emergency and place oneself between the patient and mutilation, organ failure, or death that could be avoided by medical care - is exactly what the Idaho law prohibits. Prohibiting abortions to preserve women's health, the state forces these women to deteriorate until they are near death - threatening doctors with professional sanctions, debarment, and imprisonment if they treat patients that the state has deemed unworthy of treatment.

In sum, Idaho's abortion ban requires doctors to treat women's health as if it were disposable and the risk to their lives as an acceptable risk. For this reason, the Biden Administration filed a lawsuit. As the case moved through the federal courts, the Supreme Court intervened to allow Idaho to enforce its abortion ban, even without a health exception. After all, the Dobbs decision did not require that any state allow abortions in cases of health risks to women. Sepsis, organ failure, and loss of fertility in women were all accepted tacitly by the court as an acceptable cost of the abortion ban.

State laws generally ignore federal laws for women's health protection

The oral arguments that the Supreme Court heard about whether state abortion bans would prevail over federal laws
